Unit 8 — Opinion Essay Writing

Niveau E

1. Reading

Read the text and use it for the activities below.

Reading — Opinion at three lengths

The 300-word op-ed forces the writer to choose a single best sentence and arrange the rest as a ramp toward and away from it. The 700-word column permits one well-developed counter, but only one. The 1,400-word essay can afford to lose two sentences and still land its argument; it can also support a fully-articulated counter, a partial concession, and a more subtle conclusion. Length, in this regard, is not merely cosmetic. It determines what kinds of arguments the form can carry.

Cohesion devices

Lexical chain: repeating the topic with varied vocabulary (the policy, the cap, the regulation, the measure).

Anaphoric reference: this argument, that concession, such a structure.

Conjunctive adverbs: however, nevertheless, moreover, accordingly, in this regard, by contrast.

2. Practise

Niveau E — controlled

1. Build a 4-link lexical chain for the four-day school week: ___ → ___ → ___ → ___ .
2. Match: however / accordingly / by contrast / moreover → contrast / consequence / contrast / addition.

Niveau E — productive

3. Build 4 sentences using 4 different cohesion devices on a single topic.

3. Your turn

The four-day school week is a tempting policy import. The Belgian trial of 2025-2027 reported unchanged test scores, higher pupil well-being, and modest cost savings — a finding the policy was always likely to produce. However, the trial also reported one limitation that the discussion has tended to underplay: many lower-income families struggled to arrange childcare for the extra Friday. This is the argument I want to develop. The trial is encouraging on its own terms. The policy*, transferred to a different national context, is a different object. By contrast with Belgium, my home district has neither publicly-funded Friday childcare nor a tradition of Wednesday-afternoon-style half-days.* The schedule we would actually face on import day is therefore not the schedule the trial measured. Such a structure would shift the burden of the well-being gain onto the families least able to absorb it. Accordingly, my position is conditional rather than oppositional: I would support a four-day school week here only if a publicly-funded Friday childcare option were funded first. Critics will argue, fairly, that this conditions the reform out of existence. In response, I would say that the well-being gain in Belgium is partly a product of the conditions Belgium already had; transplanting the policy without those conditions risks reproducing the headline without the result. Moreover, the public-administration literature is consistent on this point: well-being interventions fail when their structural pre-conditions are not in place. In this regard, the right question is not should we adopt the policy? but what would have to be true for it to deliver here?. That is, in my view, the more useful conversation.
