Vocabulary — digital workplace

remote work, hybrid, on-site, video call, asynchronous, synchronous, time zone, work-life balance, digital fatigue, coworking space, freelance, team channel, deliverable, milestone.

Reading — Hybrid, Honestly

Many workers say they enjoy working from home for two reasons: no commute and quieter focus. Many also admit that they miss bumping into colleagues. The common compromise — hybrid — gets defended weakly. Most people prefer hybrid because it minimises the downsides of both options, not because it maximises either.

Grammar — gerund vs. to-infinitive

After enjoy, miss, admit, finish, mind, suggest, avoid, recommend, can't help: gerund (-ing).

- I enjoy working from home.
- They miss bumping into colleagues.

After want, plan, decide, choose, hope, refuse, agree, manage, learn: to-infinitive.

- They chose to work hybrid.
- He decided to leave the office at 5.

After like, love, hate, prefer, start, begin, continue: both forms with very small meaning shift.

3. Practise

Niveau G

1. Choose: gerund or to-infinitive: I enjoy _____ (work) from home. I plan _____ (apply) for a remote job.
2. Match: enjoy → -ing; want → to-infinitive; admit → -ing.

Niveau M

3. Build 5 sentences using 5 different verbs that take gerund vs. to-infinitive.

4. Your turn

Opinion piece, 150 words. Should young workers look for hybrid jobs? Take a position. Use 2 gerunds + 2 to-infinitives + 1 despite/because of.

Sample

Young workers should consider hybrid roles, but not for the obvious reasons. They should choose to look at hybrid because it forces a small discipline: the need to plan working from home so it doesn't become lonely, and the need to plan office days so they aren't purely social. Despite the loud debate online, hybrid is rarely either heaven or hell. Most workers admit missing certain things on both sides. I enjoy working alone for long blocks; I also like to overhear ideas I wouldn't have asked about. I plan to look for a hybrid junior role for my first year of work, then decide based on what I actually feel — not on what the internet thinks I should feel.
